

It has been clear from the highly monocultured coverage of the War in Iraq that there is way too much concentration of ownership of media already. We should be applying anti-trust and breaking up media ownership now, not concentrating it further.

Clear-channel is a good example of a pervasive monoculture of broadcast radio. They have market power that is warping the entire radio and music industry.

In general the goal should be the separation of content from transport. When they are both owned by the same company, then they can use it as a choke point to control what content is distributed.
